Ancient beekeeping Primitive beekeeping consisted of hunting wild swarms in the spring, which were placed in hives made of straw, mud or hollow tree trunks; at the end of the summer the beekeeper killed the bees of most of their beehives, trimmed the honeycombs and poured the honey, separating it from the wax.

Now beekeeping, or apiculture as it is also known, is the human activity of maintaining honey bees. A beekeeper, or apiarist (that will soon be you), is someone who keeps bees for the purpose of collecting their honey and other products that are produced by the hive such as propolis, beeswax and royal jelly, or to pollinate crops, or to produce bees for sale to other beekeepers.
